fish have long been used as sentinel species for environmental pollution (Hard, M.G.J., 2002).

Biomarkers, loosely defined as measurable effects providing evidence of exposure, will ideally lead to the establishment of causality and provide the necessary data to inform management decisions. Despite the increasing importance of fish cell lines and the development of in vitro co-culture models

Short-term adult fish reproductive tests are widely used to assess the toxicity of chemicals and waste streams.

However, these tests often have low power to detect differences in egg production among treatments, due to high variance and small sample sizes, limiting their effectiveness for informing regulatory decisions.

Fish may be applied as biomarkers in order to elucidate the aquatic behavior of environmental pollutions, and to assess exposure of aquatic organisms (Van der Oost et al., 2003). So called biomarker response can be measured in organs, tissues, cells or body fluids. That response is a reaction on xenobiotics and is restricted to physiological, biochemical, cellular or even molecular changes
